Tokyo's fraught Olympics set to begin after decade of drama

LISA DU & YUKI HAGIWARA
July 22

WHEN A NEARLY empty National Stadium in Tokyo lights up on Friday evening in Japan to mark the beginning of the delayed Summer Olympics, Covid-19's scar on the event will be glaring.

Gone will be the celebratory cheer that accompanies the start of any Games. Instead of thousands in the audience, there will be empty stands and performers in masks.

For the first time in history, events at Tokyo 2020 will be held without spectators and winners will place their own medals around their necks. Delegations landed amid the looming threat of the infectious delta variant, which has triggered case surges throughout Asia. Athletes social distance in the Olympic Village and eat between plastic barriers in the cafeteria.

"To be honest, I did not expect the Olympics to be happening like this. I thought the coronavirus would be gone or settled by the time the Olympics started," Tokyo 2020 chief Toshiro Muto told a press briefing earlier this week. "It hasn't, and in some ways the problem has gotten more serious."

Covid has been only the latest, albeit biggest, challenge for an Olympics that's been mired in drama for nearly a decade, from a scrapped stadium design to a bribery probe. The senior officials who championed the bid — including former Prime Minister Shinzo Abe — are no longer in office, undone by scandal and stress. The official cost of the Games has more than doubled to $15.4 billion from its original estimate, including an extra $3 billion needed for the delay and Covid-related safety measures.

Support from the Japanese public — long known globally as an enthusiastic Olympic fan — has waned amid concerns about the Games becoming a superspreader event. A July 3-4 survey by broadcaster JNN found that 34% wanted to cancel, or postpone them again. The country's largest companies have made moves to distance themselves, including global sponsor Toyota Motor, which said this week it won't be airing ads in Japan that feature the Olympics.

Even though athletes and other participants aren't allowed to interact with the Japanese public, concerns have grown over the past week about the potential for outbreaks in the so-called Olympic bubble. A handful of athletes have already tested positive for Covid, including an alternate for the US women's gymnastics team. And in another blow, the director of the opening ceremony was fired a day before the Games started for comments he made about the Holocaust two decades ago.

Japan's journey to the 2020 Olympics started more than a decade ago and was preceded by disaster. In March 2011, as officials were readying to announce another bid after losing out to Rio de Janeiro for 2016, a magnitude-9.0 earthquake struck off the northeastern coast and caused the worst nuclear disaster since Chernobyl.

"There was a strategic decision made to tie the Tokyo bid to reconstruction of the earthquake-devastated area as that would be the biggest appeal," recalled Yuji Ishizaka, a sports sociologist at Nara Women's University who researches the Olympics. The reconstruction theme was used initially to gain the acceptance of the Japanese public for the bid, and then later as a pitch to the International Olympic Committee, Ishizaka said.

Tokyo's first setback after winning the 2020 Games came in 2015, when the budget for its new national stadium — designed by late celebrity architect Zaha Hadid — swelled to over 50% its original estimate and was set to become the most expensive ever built. Under the pressure of falling support numbers, Abe scrapped the design in favor of a do-over.

"What was striking about it was just the indecision around it. They were all like, 'what should we do?'" said Jules Boykoff, a professor at Pacific University in Oregon who has written several books on the Olympics. "That really opened my eyes. Maybe this safe pair of hands isn't so safe after all."

China fines Tencent, technology giants over child exploitation

ZHEPING HUANG
July 22

CHINESE INTERNET REGULATORS slapped fines on technology firms including Tencent Holdings and Alibaba Group Holding for spreading sexually suggestive content involving children.

Kuaishou Technology, Tencent's QQ, Alibaba's Taobao, Weibo and Little Red Book were ordered to remove the offending accounts and pay an unspecified amount in fines, the Cyberspace

Administration of China said in a statement on Tuesday. The penalties were issued as part of a campaign to tackle online content deemed "harmful to the physical and mental well-being of minors."

The agency will "step up the enforcement of laws and regulations, and punish those who violate the rules," CAC said in the statement.

"There will be a 'zero tolerance' approach toward issues that hurt minors."

In recent months, social media users and state news outlets have called out e-commerce platforms where sellers use suggestive photos of child models to sell goods as well as manipulated gifs and videos that exploit minors.

The cyberspace regulator is also planning to tackle under-aged live-streaming, the quality of online education platforms, violent and sexually explicit animation, online communities and celebrity fan clubs as part of its campaign, the statement added.

The crackdown adds to the pressure on China's internet sector, which is already facing scrutiny over issues ranging from antitrust to data security.

The CAC this month burst into prominence after announcing a probe into Didi Global and unveiling rules that will require any company seeking to go public in a foreign country to seek its approval. —BLOOMBERG
